Dr. Farmer is the co-founder and chief strategist of Partners In Health (PIH), a non-profit organization that provides healthcare to impoverished communities around the world. He is also a professor of global health and social medicine at Harvard Medical School and has written extensively about the social determinants of health and the importance of social justice in healthcare.

The Lecture

In his lecture, Dr. Farmer spoke about the history of public anthropology in California, the challenges facing the discipline today, and the importance of training the next generation of anthropologists to work in the public sphere. He began by discussing the work of early California anthropologists such as Alfred Hulse Brooks, who studied the indigenous peoples of the state, and Robert Lowie, who conducted fieldwork among the Crow Indians of Montana.

Dr. Farmer then went on to discuss the challenges facing public anthropology today. He noted that the discipline is often underfunded and that anthropologists who work in the public sphere often face resistance from powerful interests. He also discussed the importance of training the next generation of anthropologists to work in the public sphere. He emphasized the need for anthropologists to be able to communicate their findings to a wide range of audiences, including policymakers, the media, and the general public.

The Next Generation

Dr. Farmer concluded his lecture by speaking about the next generation of anthropologists. He said that he is optimistic about the future of the discipline and that he believes that the next generation of anthropologists will be able to make a significant contribution to the world. He encouraged the students in the audience to pursue their passion for anthropology and to use their skills to make a difference in the world.

Dr. Farmer's lecture was a powerful and inspiring call to action for the next generation of anthropologists. He reminded us of the importance of public anthropology and the need to train the next generation of anthropologists to work in the public sphere. He also gave us hope for the future, reminding us that the next generation of anthropologists has the potential to make a significant contribution to the world.
